At the time of the Battle of Brandywine, the roughly seven thousand acres which comprise the landmark site were primarily woodlands which had been converted in part to farmland. The area was fairly populous, with a number of small hamlets each containing a tavern, a house or two, a "shoo" or store, and perhaps a mill. These included Dilworthtown, then Dilworth, and Chadds Ford. Birminghamtown, a similar center, near the Meetinghouse, has passed into oblivion. The majority of the farmhouses were wooden, of which many no longer exist. However, several of the more substantial stone houses still stand, including;

1. Birmingham Friends Meetinghouse, 1767, Birmingham Road
2. Daniel Davis House and Barn, 1740, Birmingham and Street Roads
3. Brinton's Mill, 1719, Route 100, at Brinton's Bridge
4. Barns-Brinton House, c. 1726, E of Hamorton on Route 1
5. Pennsbury (Lancaster) Inn, Route 1 at Hickory Hill Road

9. John Chadd House, pre-1725, Route 100
10. 1704 House, 1/4 mile S. of Dilworthtown on Route 202
11. Chadds Ford Historic district, Route 1 and Route 100
12. Gilpin Homestead (Howe's Head-quarters) 1754, Harvey Road
13. Ring House reconstruction (Washington's Head-quarters), pre-1750, Brandywine Battlefield Park
14. Gideon Gilpin House, pre-1745, (Lafayette's Quarters), Brandywine Battlefield Park

There have been many structures added since 1777, but the bulk of the land is still in farmland and woodland (although less heavily wooded). An electric power line that parallels the creek just north of Chadds Ford is one notable intrusion.

The state maintains a 50 acre park on Route 1, which contains a reconstruction of Washington's headquarters, and a restoration of a farmhouse and outbuildings, where Lafayette was quartered the night before the battle.

The boundary includes many features--buildings, improved highways, etc.--which do not contribute to the national significance of the landmark but as an assembly, not sufficiently intrusive to warrant further delimitation of the boundary.

STATEMENT OF SIGNIFICANCE
The Battle of Brandywine, September 11, 1777, was the only major clash between Washington's Continentals and the British forces under Lord Howe during the campaign which resulted in the capture of Philadelphia, the American capital. Although the battle was an American defeat, the Continentals demonstrated a newly-won ability to withstand the determined attack of British regulars, even while sustaining heavy losses. Having sailed up the Chesapeake Bay from New York, to attack Philadelphia from the south, Howe confronted a firmly-entrenched American army on the eastern bank of the Brandywine Creek, at Chadds Ford, Pa. Howe employed a flanking maneuver which caught the Americans unaware, due to faulty and contradictory intelligence reports; and then having them off-balance, made a frontal attack on Washington's weakened center line. Washington was enabled by the fall of night to successfully retreat to Chester, after an afternoon of some of the fiercest fighting of the Revolution. Today the rolling farmland along the Brandywine has not been greatly changed from the woods and farm land over which the battle raged. Much of the land is still open, and an abundance of 18th century stone houses remain. In the spring and much of the summer of 1777, Washington and Howe had engaged in fruitless maneuvers in New Jersey. At last, in mid-August, Howe moved to New York where he embarked most of his army (18,000 men) to initiate an offensive campaign to take Philadelphia, via the Chesapeake Bay. Washington countered with a southward move, where he waited first in Wilmington and then Chadds Ford for Howe's advance. By September 10, he was in position on the eastern bank of the Brandywine, centered around Chadds Ford. He deployed his forces (11,000 men) in two portions; one under his personal command on either side of the Baltimore Pike, which crossed the creek at Chadds Ford (here, on the eastern heights, Proctor emplaced his artillery), and the other portion, under General Sullivan, upstream, to intercept any crossings made above Chadds Ford. Howe arrived in Kennett on the 10th, and on the morning of the 11th, he put his plan into action, sending a force under General Knyphausen down the Baltimore Pike towards Chadds Ford. The Hessian troops encountered sharp resistance, especially at the Kennett Meetinghouse, but pushed on until they gained the western bank of the Brandywine Creek. Here no effort was made to ford, but their heavy artillery and small arms fire kept the main body of the American army occupied in this diversionary feint. Meanwhile Howe directed Cornwallis to march twelve miles north with the rest of the army, (10 thousand) where he crossed at Jeffris Ford, well above Sullivan's position. Washington's intelligence reported this flanking movement early in the day, but this report was contradicted by a later one from Sullivan's scouts. When the attack was confirmed, Washington rushed Greene to the north to bolster Sullivan's hastily reformed line. Cornwallis, directing his troops from Osborne Hill, attacked Sullivan along Street Road, and here on the heights around the Birmingham Meetinghouse, the heaviest fighting raged. Just as Greene arrived, Sullivan's line broke, and Greene put up a stiff delaying action to cover the retreat. Meanwhile, at Chadds Ford, Knyphausen, seeing the depletion of the American forces by troop movements to the north, and hearing the sound of the battle in the north, chose to attack across the ford. These troops under General Wayne were being slowly forced to retire, when they were attacked on their unprotected flank from the north, and were put to rout. Nightfall ended the battle, with the Americans retreating to Chester, defeated, but still intact, and the British camping near the battleground, only 30 miles and 14 days from Philadelphia.
